DC Dave Thomason has been fascinated with policing ever since he was a child watching police procedural dramas play out on TV.

He says: 'I'd always been interested in police work. Since being a child, I was obsessed with The Bill, the TV show, and it might seem a bit corny but I was really interested in police work, so far as it was portrayed on the screen.'

Dave started his career in policing after studying linguistics and German at university. The analytic and linguistic skills he developed helped him with his current role in the anti-stalking unit where he processes information to help solve cases. As part of his professional development, Dave has also continued with post-graduate research into investigative policing, partly funded by the police service.

*There is no greater satisfaction than knowing that somebody's safe, and feels safe.
That's why we do this.*

In Dave's line of work, no day looks the same. He could be focusing on a live active investigation, an officer may need immediate guidance or there could be a stalking protection order to process or a risk profile to write up.

Dave has also shared his expertise across the world with other policing services, including a trip to Australia where he spoke at a domestic violence forum.
