

Record courts backlog 'will take time' to resolve

Published on 24 November 2021

The mounting backlog in the courts is being addressed, says Dominic Raab

It could be another year before the court backlog returns to pre-pandemic levels, Justice Secretary Dominic Raab has warned.

New rules and limitations were introduced to the courts during the pandemic, such as the suspension of jury trials due to social distancing rules. This has led to an increased backlog in the criminal justice system.

September statistics show a record 60,692 outstanding cases in crown courts, while there were 364,122 outstanding cases in the magistrates' courts at the end of June.

Delayed cases are costly and have negative implications.

Some trials are being delayed until 2023, leaving victims, witnesses and defendants disillusioned as they wait to access justice.

We have been highlighting the problems plaguing the justice system since long before the pandemic and now is the time for action before it's too late.

Raab addressed the mounting backlog at a fringe event at the Conservative Party Conference in October, saying: 'it will take some time. It will take a good six months to a year to get back to the pre-pandemic stage.'

Raab also listed measures that the government is considering to tackle the backlog. These include creating super courts in Manchester and Loughborough and using technology to 'drive cases forward'.
