

Police leadership commission wants to hear what matters to you

Published on 8 January 2026

Share your views on police leadership and help shape the future of policing

News 2 mins read

The police leadership commission is calling on anyone interested in police leadership to share their views and opinions.

Set up by the College of Policing with the support of the Home Office, the police leadership commission is conducting a comprehensive review of police leadership to ensure policing can meet evolving challenges and public expectations.

The importance of the commission's work in relation to strengthening and defining the future of police leadership, is referenced in the government's white paper, 'From local to national: A new model for policing'.

Chaired by former Home Secretary Lord Blunkett and former Policing Minister Lord Herbert of South Downs, the commission brings together experts from policing, the military, the private sector and academia to identify best practice and learning from across different sectors. Find out more about the commission members.

Call for evidence

The commission welcomes a diverse range of opinions and recognises this is a pivotal moment to strengthen police leadership. Future leaders need to be equipped with the knowledge, skills, and capabilities to face upcoming challenges and deliver a trusted service that cuts crime and keeps people safe.

You may already work, or have worked in policing, be a partner who collaborates with the police service, or a member of the public who cares about policing in your community. Different viewpoints from across all sections of society will help create a blueprint for police leadership that truly serves everyone.

Tell us what matters to you and be part of the conversation for change.

Call for evidence closed

Our call for evidence closed at 11:59am on 12 February 2026.

Thank you to everyone who provided feedback.

Results and recommendations

The commission will carefully analyse all responses alongside other evidence being gathered. Findings and recommendations will be presented to the Home Secretary in May 2026.

Your honest opinions are vital to develop leadership that rebuilds trust and delivers the service communities deserve.

The commission aims to provide a blueprint for police leadership that restores public confidence and ensures the service can meet the needs of communities for decades to come. This is your police service, and we want to hear your voice.

Tags

Leadership development